On January 26 the State of New Mexico introduced SJM 25, a memorial that may impede the Navajo Nation Proposed Water Rights Settlement. Navajo Nation leaders have expressed their opposition to the legislature, saying the memorial is disadvantageous to their earlier negotiations with the State of New Mexico.

New Mexico Senate Majority Floor Leader Manny Aragon (D-Albuquerque) introduced the memorial during the first day of the New Mexico State Legislation in Santa Fe.

According to a New Mexico State Legislative Update, Aragon requested that the State Engineer (SE) and Interstate Stream Commission (ISC) to include non-native stakeholders in Navajo Nation water rights settlement discussions: SE to investigate, analyze and take public testimony on how proposed settlement will affect all stakeholders in the San Juan Basin; SE and ISC to develop a comprehensive management plan to ensure equitable distribution of water, and to report status and progress to the interim Water and Natural Resources Committee by 11/30/04.

Navajo Nation Officers immediately expressed apprehension over the legislation. Vice President Frank Dayish, Jr. stated, "The Navajo Nation does not support the memorial. Our intent is to develop ways and means to provide water from the San Juan River, not only for our reservation but other areas such as the City of Gallup and the Jicarilla Indian reservation. We have been actively working toward a delicate balance for providing water for home use, agriculture, commerce and industry for both Indians and non-Indians alike, now and for future generations."

Dayish wasn't the only official to counter the legislation.

Navajo Nation Council Resources Committee Chairperson George Arthur stated that the memorial was "misleading" and "detrimental" to earlier negotiations between the Navajo Nation and the State of New Mexico.

The Navajo Nation Water Settlement Agreement reads, in part: The proposed settlement agreement is intended to provide water rights and associated development projects, including the Navajo-Gallup Water Supply Project, for the benefit of the Navajo Nation in exchange for a release of claims to water that potentially might otherwise displace existing non-Navajo water users in the Basin in New Mexico.

Navajo Nation Joe Shirley, Jr. stated, "The settlement is favorable to the Navajo Nation....I stand in support of the settlement and legislation."
